WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

Mid and high clouds at the southern end of the frontal system are streaming over the region. A few very light rain showers are possible in far NW CA early Tuesday and higher elevations may see westerly gusts reach 30-35 mph. The remainder of the region will be dry with above normal temperatures today.

Strong high pressure just west of California will push that system off to the east by late Tuesday and skies will clear. Dry and warmer conditions will follow Wednesday through at least next weekend. N-NE/offshore surface winds will reach 25 mph in the typical areas from the western Cascade-Sierra slopes to the coast early Wednesday, and more gusty N-NE winds are expected each morning from Friday through Sunday down the western Cascade-Sierra slopes and in the northern Sacramento Valley. Overall, other than the light rain in far NW CA through early Tuesday, little to no rain is expected in the region for the next two weeks.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

This surface high pressure will weaken this afternoon causing winds to decrease and become light by Tuesday morning. A ridge aloft will weaken a little bringing a few degrees of cooling to the region both Tuesday and Wednesday. The most cooling will occur near the coast. There will be little change in temperature Thursday through this weekend as the ridge of high pressure aloft remains fairly strong. Most locations away from the coast will be 10 to 15 degrees above normal during this period and the valleys of Southern California will get into the low 80s. Minimum humidity will be in the single digits and teens away from the San Joaquin Valley and coast through Tuesday and then increase mainly into the teens Wednesday through this weekend. There will be local northeast to east winds of 10 to 20 mph with gusts to 35mph across the mountains and below the canyons and passes of Southern California Friday through this weekend. Otherwise, winds will be light Tuesday through this weekend.
