WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

After a stretch of quiet weather, the first in a series of storm systems will move through the region late Tuesday through early Thursday morning. This system will bring heavy rain, strong winds, and mountain snow. Strong gusty winds are expected late Wednesday morning through the evening and travel could be difficult for high profile vehicles during this time. Snow levels will be high at the start of this system, around 7000 – 8000 feet, and will lower down to 3500 feet by late Wednesday night. The heaviest rain is expected to fall early Wednesday morning through late Wednesday night before tapering off to showers by Thursday morning. With lowering snow levels toward the end of the heaviest rain.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

A series of storms in strong westerly flow will bring rain and mountain snow to the region this coming Wednesday night through next Monday. The first storm will move over the area Wednesday night through Thursday, accompanied by moderate rain and mountain snow. Snow levels will be near 5,000 feet with 4 to 8 inches above that level. The Friday storm looks to be stronger, with moderate to heavy rain and mountain snow, with 6-16 inches of snow above 5,000 feet. However, snow levels may drop to 3,500 to 4,000 feet creating winter driving conditions over major mountain passes such as Tejon Pass. Gusty south winds are also expected. Details on the Sunday to Monday storm are still low certainty, but it has the potential to produce additional heavy rain and mountain snow, with strong south winds.
